MISCELLANEOUS READING. A PARIS COOK.

This society has just experienced a sensible loss. The first cook of Paris is dead. M. Chevet was a man of quality, who had reseived a very good literary education rather than that of a professionist-a learned cook. Chevet knew that though man eats, it is only the intelligent man who knows how to eat. Also, when a dinner was ordered of him, he occupied himself as much with the mind as the stomach. A light and gay talker, he served, through his waiters, all the dinners of common diners, but when an epicurean, a fine judge of things came, then the love of his art inflamed him. He would have but few persons at table, not more than a dozen. and, according to his opinion, a dinner must not last longer than three hours. He forbid to eat when the appetite was not awakened. the stomach being ungrateful and always the chamber of the Common Council of Alex. ready to aband in you. He recommended only to unite persons at dinner who agreed in opinions and in morals. He cared for all; the temperature of the dining room he fixed at 13 degrees (in winter,) and wished to see a flood of light. Contrary to the opinion of Prillard Savario, the celebrated author of a gastronomical work, he did not permit looking glasses in the dining room "Only with an empty stomach, he used to say, you may regard yourself in a mirror. Prillard Savarin required music at his dinners; Chevet only wind instruments, which have the superiority of Apicius over Lucullus. In this respect I consider him in error. Chevet had an original turn of mind, and held much on his gastronomic reputation. He often regretted that the taste was lost in France, and he would with instructions to advocate the revocation of have founded an acadmie de la queule if he any power heretofore given by said stockhold- could have united academicians enough. But ers to the Directory, to authorize the piers of the he said, if the French Academy can dispense Aqueduct over the Potomac to be used for the with literati, the academic de la queule cannot dispense with true gastronomers. Chevet has died of a congestion of the brain. It is said that he has left valuable notes of which

A DUCK POND,

A grumbling victim of a busband anathematizes those seductive bonnets exhibited in shop windows to tempt weak women to step inside and purchase. A wife looks-sails around it-admires and admires-ventures closer and closer-opens her mouth-and with one bold gulp, she and her purse are lings or other houses, may rest assured they can fairly hooked and taken in. Our victim be supplied with a first rate article for dwellings overneard his wife in an ecstacy of unconand a common one for other buildings upon as trollable admiration exclaim: "There's a good terms as it can be had in any of the large duck of a bonnet !" He replied as tenderly as possible: "No my dear, not a duck, but a decoy duck of a bonnet! It is only placed there to induce a pretty little duck, like yoursell, my dear, to rush in after another!" He characterises a milliner's shop as a duck pond, full of decoy ducks.
